Despite differences in healthcare financing among developed economies, private health insurance often plays a distinctive role in their healthcare systems and form interdependence with public health coverage schemes. As part of the effort in recalibrating the public-private balance of the healthcare system in Hong Kong, the Government has introduced a Voluntary Health Insurance Scheme (VHIS), formerly called Health Protection Scheme. In this System for Health seminar jointly presented by the JC School of Public Health and Primary Care, CUHK and the Hong Kong Academy of Medicine, we will bring together international and local experts to explore the role of private health insurance in Hong Kong and discuss the prospect of VHIS from perspectives of healthcare financing, insurance industry, and service providers, respectively.
